Deepwater Railway Station

The young Douglas Marr and one other person were killed by an explosion while working on the new railway line coming into Deepwater in 1885. they were buried, what was then Deepwater cemetery. Sadly, the tombstones of these two lads are no longer there. The tombstone of Douglas Marr has been located.

1989. Since the trains stopped the building has been variously used for a Radio Station (2CBD), by an active Pottery group, by an active Art Group, by many willy wag tail families and for Community Carol singing. Recently a new subcommittee of the Progress Association has been formed, called "Deepwater Railway Historical Society" and it has hit

Deepwater Railway Station was opened in 1886 and in its heyday became the busiest and biggest freight centre north of Newcastle. The railway gave a boost to the population in Deepwater and to business in the area. Mining and agriculture products were transported by rail, but this started to reduce over the years. Changing the transport costs of wool from by the pound to by the bale may have been a reason the use of rail became out of favour. We believe that the last train to come through was about 1988 The line north of Glen Innes was formally suspended after 22 October
